FUND MANAGER COMMENTARY AT 31 OCT 2023

Central banks continue to talk about higher rates, maintaining their narrative on rate hikes, data dependence and higher-for-longer interest rates. As a consequence, the market has done much of the heavy lifting for the US Federal Reserve (Fed), with bond yields rising significantly over the course of 3Q23 and in October. This market-led tightening means that central banks have not found it necessary to hike rates again at their most recent meetings. Increasingly, we believe that interest rate hikes are done and that we have reached the plateau at the top. There will likely be a protracted period of keeping rates high, and we are battling to see rate cuts before 3Q24 at the earliest. We maintain our view that bonds are an attractive investment at current levels, offering a combination of decent income yields and a good prospect of possible capital gains. We prefer the bonds in the 7-to-10-year area of the US yield curve, and we will include more of these where it suits the mandates and portfolio objectives.
